

Dealing with Sexual Disinhibition

DO'S AND DON'TS

We must remember that dementia is a disease and that the brain is physically changing. These changes cause a person to act differently. The most effective way to deal with sexual disinhibition while maintaining client-centered care is to make observations about the behavior, identify possible triggers, and develop a strategy in response. Below are some simple do's and don'ts when dealing with sexual disinhibition in a client with dementia.

Don't:

- Label people by saying “wanderer” or “sexually aggressive.”
- Tell the person that it is inappropriate.
- Try to reason with them.
- Scold them. Disinhibition in dementia is due to physiological changes in the brain—not because the person is a “pervert” or that the disease has made them stop thinking about how others feel.
- Generally, it is not productive to tell the person you are married.

Do:

- Acknowledge the person's desire to engage in sexual behavior. As we age, our desire for sexual attention does not go away.
- Consider that the behavior stems from an underlying need for affection. Look for other ways to fulfill this basic human need for affection and appropriate touch.
- Wear a name badge and professional uniform. This may provide a visual sign that you are not here in any sexual capacity.
- Observe if any particular care tasks are triggering sexually inappropriate behavior.
- Place an object of interest in the client's hands during care and/or during times when you know the behavior might occur.
- Engage in a conversation about love or affection. Perhaps offer an alternative form of affectionate touch like a back massage.
- Divert attention to a known activity of interest. For example, play your client's favorite song.
- Be assertive in delivering direction to divert attention. Stay confident and strong.
- Always remember that you have the Seniors At Home team to support you—just ask!

If you follow these do's and don'ts but continue to feel uncomfortable with a particular client, discuss the situation with your supervisor.
